Jack Frest-Fruit-Prespects Improving.

For some days past, the question as to the effect of the visitation of Jack Frost, has absorbed more attention hereabout than the news of the sulphurous performance about Sevastopol. On Tucsday the public mourned over buds of promise untimely blighted. But we are happy to be able to give some encouragement as to the fruit prospects. A ramble among the hills and along the river valley on yesterday, afforded the gratifying evidence of the vitality of vegetation. Potatees, peas and many other vegetables, though soft and young, have escaped damage; while some of the most tender tropicals have suffered severely. The fruit, however-even the tender shoots of the grape-with its delicate and exposed blossom buds, have been much less affected than was at first apprehended; some tender leaves are crisped and some whole shoots destroyed, but a bountiful Providence has furnished a sufficient supply to bear this thinning. The peaches and other fruits are so guarded by the surrounding embrasures of rich foliage. that they appear to have escaped material damage, though the chilling influence of the storm may yet be manifested by the dropping of the fruit at a later pe-

On the hills we understand the effects of the frost to have been more severe .--Several farmers have informed us that their cherries were killed, and many are under apprehensions concerning the grapes .- Cin. Commercial.

More about Hiss.

BOSTON, May 14. Some confusion was caused in the House to day by the expelled Joseph Hiss of numery and Mrs. Patterson notoriety. He entered the Hall and resumed his vacated seat twice, and each time was removed by the Sergeant at Arms, by erder, which passed the House almost unanimously. It is presumed that Hiss acted in this most singular manner by advice of his counsel.

Messrs. B. F. Butler and Bonjamin Dean, counsel for Hiss in the late investigation, publish an address, denouncing his expulsion from the House as arbitrary, and done on frivolous pretences, and intimating that members of the House feared an impartial development of all the facts in the case.
